

Some Yesterdays in Utah Railroadng...

ELECTRIC LOCOMOTIVE of the old Salt Lake and Utah Railroad is shown in 1929 making up a train. The railroad operated from Payson on the south to Salt Lake City on the north. Photo was loaned to the Herald by Steve Belmont, as was the one below.

ONE OF THE LAST regular Heber Creeper runs, the picture having been taken in July 1968 in Heber. The old station still stands and has been restored by the Wasatch Mountain Railway Company. Excursion trains have run in recent years from Heber to Provo Canyon.

YOU'D HAVE to be a genuine Utah Valley old-timer to remember this scene — a glimpse of railroading some 60 years ago. The photo was taken at the "Provo River Gaging Station" near Utah Lake. It was furnished to the Herald in connection with our Centennial Edition published last August — and we are sorry that the name of the persons submitting it has been misplaced. One thing for sure, the view is scenic as well as nostalgic. We'd like to learn more about that "gaging station" and this particular phase of railroading.
